PRESS RELEASES (1970AJ)

[From the translations of Patrick Albermarion]

On the road from Eyeaff Dubbleue:

"What are they waiting for?" hissed Halfflower, tiring of his perch in a tall tree.

Some minutes ago Leomund had halted on the road for no apparant reason. A small but distinct flash of blue light was seen and Leomund's band began to move onward toward the hissing orcs.

As they approached, King Leomund was deep in thought. His knights, Tie-roan, Chriswise, Lord Henry and Prince Leo were all in animated conversation, especially Prince Leo. Almost without warning the orcs swing from the trees, hacking and thrusting with their crescent-shaped blades. Tie-roan and Prince Leo were unhorsed, Chriswise was beset by 4 orcs and Lord Henry was lying wounded, about to be finished by Halfflower's blade when Leomund snapped back to full awariness. He wielded his giasat sword VETO and called upon the heat of the Star of Calenhad and the tumult of rain from the Gem of the Misty Mountains.

At once VETO gleamed a radiant red, and dark clouds filled the sky. The orcs were terrified, some fleeing at the display. Just as Halfflower was about to drive his blade home he screamed in untold agony as the red-hot VETO clove his arm from his body. Amid the terror and confusion the swords of Eyeaff Dubbleue; VETO, PIASCO, LEGION, CALIF and TINTINABULIUM, slaughtered the score-plus-one of orcs. Only Halfflower escaped, screaming obscene incantations of the Black Tongue at the victorious Forces of the King.

In the Land of Cycle (pronounced as Sickel) Morgoth quickly prepared a force of orcs to overtake Lumberman and slay Leomund. He saw the power of the Star of Calenhad and the Gem of the Misty Mountains, but he felt the Silmaril and the "Golden Glow" of Bârad Hawley were their match. Just as he was to leave to vanquish the King of Eyeaff Dubbleue, he cursed loudly and returned to the citadel. Were Gygax to come while he was gone, he could lay waste to Bârad Hawley of Sanas A Diego!

The orcs were sent forth, but Morgoth held little hope for their success. He would have to match Leomund himself.

At the Bridge of Osgilath:

Gygax stood on the bridge in his deep blue cloak awaiting the men of Bârad Tirith. He saw the victory of the Star of Calenhad, and only hoped he would fair as well. As long as none of the robbers could wield the 'Seman' he was safe!

Before him stood the band of Bârad Tirith. Their leader, Pîll Prithurd, swaggered forward to challenge the stranger in blue.

"Where are you bound for, gentlemen?" said Gyax.

the unit is annihilated. While I know of no other GM who follows this practice, I've heard of no reason why a GM should interfere in the course of the game.

My thanks, too, for your support of THE DIPLOMACY ASSOCIATION. Membership fees are literally pouring in. The membership will undoubtedly encompass the bulk of existing players. Every effort is to be expended in bringing new players into postal Diplomacy.
