You will notice that the address for Marck Morrison is different from the one I originally gave you. Please make note of his new address.

Let's see. Cliff, Marck, Mark, and John Sokol are old friends(?) of mine and I know what kind of play I can expect from them. Robert, Clyde, and John Machir are new to me and I bid them welcome. Rest assured that this game will not be dull.

In case you do not know from whence your game gets its namesake: The Romans excelled at outmaneuvering their enemies in the field. Their formations and tactics alike were flexible and in 197BC, against a Macedonian phalanx at Cynoscephalae, they demonstrated that this combination of mobility and adaptability was almost unbeatable.

The Macedonian phalanx was indeed an awesome sight. At Cynoscephalae the Macedonians stood shield to shield 16-deep, wielding 21-foot spears. The Roman and Macedonian armies each numbered about 26,000 men.

The bulk of the Roman line charged the main Macedonian phalanx while troops of the Roman right wing moved up to head off Macedonian reinforcements and, led by war elephants, engage a second, smaller phalanx. But the main Roman front, with their short swords, could not break the enemy formation and was thrown back. A roman tribune of the right wing then looked back and, seeing his countrymen in trouble, turned with a small force to attack the Macedonian rear. The Macedonians, holding 21-foot spears and heavy shields, could not wheel about to face the new threat. The Romans cut them to pieces.

When the battle was over the rigid phalanx had been routed and the Romans had broken Macedonia's hold on Greece. 8,000 Macedonians died; only 700 Romans.

PRESS

Paris, August 1902---News from the front.
More and more bad news came streaming into the capitol today about the war being waged by the French forces. With the turnabout of the English forces and the Italian breaking their non-aggression pact things look dark for France. The French First Army, the invaders of Germany, barely were able to safely return to France while the French soldiers kept out the hated Germans. The English armies that the French put on the European continent showed their gratitude by invading French soil, but luckily there was no real harm done. In the south, Marseilles fell before a treacherous attack of the Italian army which
