EPILOGUE

My daughter's soccer team can never be accused of being underachievers. This year was the first year of high school for many of them, so we decided before the season started to not set our goals too high. We wanted to play as many games as we could before the high school season started, but not to have any goals like winning the league. We entered two tournaments, one at the end of September and one at the end of October, last weekend. Well, they won their league with two games to play, beating two teams that were a year older. They also won both tournaments they entered. They are a great team to watch and are great girls too.

The boss was informed he had to reduce head count by one person. He quickly narrowed it down that the one he had to lay off was either Sue or Jack because they were the newest employees. The problem was they were both excellent workers and it was difficult to decide which one to let go. In discussing his dilemma with his friends, the boss was advised to watch the water cooler, and the first one to hit the water cooler . . . well that was the one that gets laid off. So the boss did that. He watched the water cooler, and before long, Sue went up to get a drink of water. The boss approached her and said, "Sue, I need to talk to you. I've got a problem." "What's the problem?", Sue asked. "Well, I can't decide whether to lay you or Jack off." "You'd better jack off because I'm not interested"

To keep the cheerleaders from grazing at half time.

Here is an untitled poem written by my daughter, Leslie. Hope you enjoy it.

there's a bittersweet feeling floating in the air,
thoughts of sun and fun coming
to an end.
but there's a new thought tonite
as a full moon
holds by gaze,
this time next year,
i'll be on my own
the last year of high school,
is closing fast.
too many memories
zip through my mind...
glimpses of friends, and dances,
i laugh at the funny, good times,

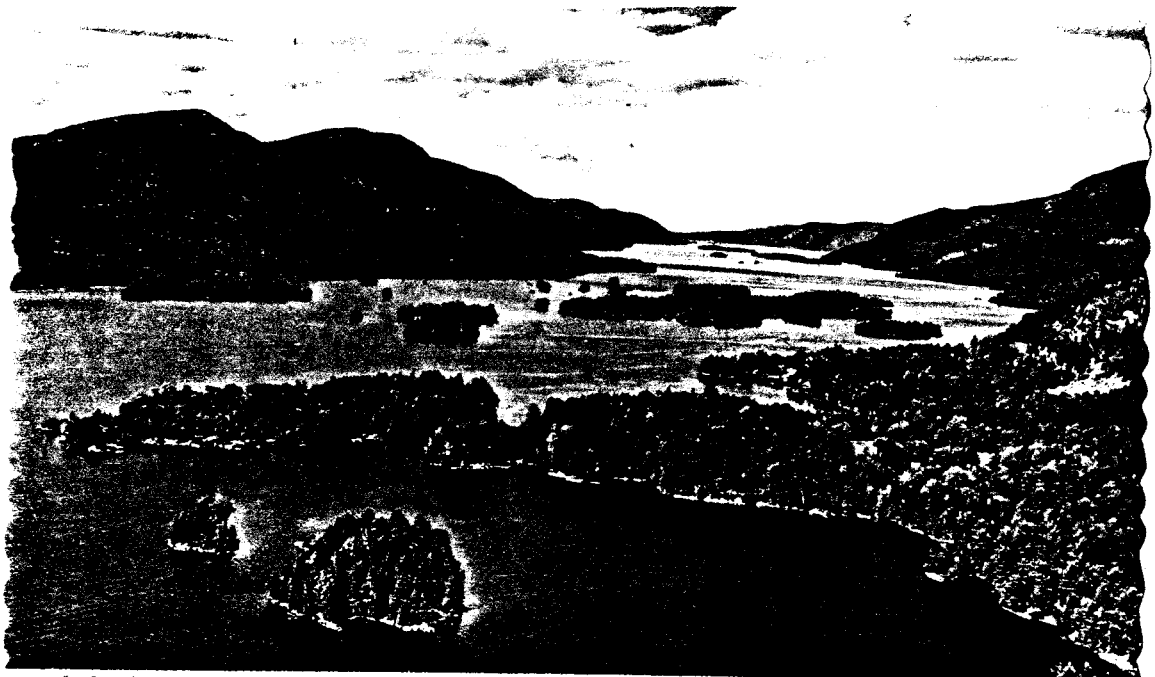

and feel the familiar pain
at the memories,
of the difficult times.
big and scary hurdles
are blocking my line to success,
money, time, decisions,
hard work.
who said growing up was fun?
the best years of your life?
once these wounds have healed,
maybe i'll look back wisely,
now i just look scared,
but they say memories are a comfort
after the pain is gone.
